In fact, foreigners now constitute the second largest population group in the United States after U.S. citizens, according to the latest U.S. Census Bureau estimates. Virtually all the foreigners are permanent residents in the country who intend to stay indefinitely, as opposed to students who are admitted on a temporary basis. During 2016, over 690,000 foreign-born persons lived in the United States, according to the American Immigration Lawyers Association. That's an increase of over 45,000 from the previous year and 1.7 million more than in 2000. Even though the U.S. may welcome foreigners, not all are accepted by their point of entry into the country. According to a 2015 report from the Department of Homeland Security, 95 percent of all immigrants admitted to the country between 2010 and 2014 were admitted through family-sponsored immigration categories. Of the 680,000 3da54e8ca3
