Recently, along with the spread of a semiconductor device, a package structure having a size of 25 mmx15 mm and a thickness of 10 mm is a mainstream as a semiconductor package. However, a thickness of the above-described package becomes large in comparison with a thickness of a semiconductor chip of the same size. For this reason, there is a problem that is an increase in weight and thickness of a product to be mounted. Further, there is a problem that a mounting area of a motherboard is reduced and the mounting height of the package becomes high. In addition, in such a package that is thin in thickness, a packaging method of the semiconductor chip is performed by bonding the semiconductor chip on a mother substrate having a chip hole with a resin and then performing a fine processing to the semiconductor chip. However, a manufacturing cost is high as compared to a normal semiconductor chip to be mounted.

Therefore, since it is difficult to use the above package as a semiconductor chip, a technique is necessary that can reduce the cost of a semiconductor chip to be mounted and the package can be used as a semiconductor chip. For example, as disclosed in Patent Document 1, a method is examined that can obtain a thin package structure by using the same process as a normal semiconductor chip and mounting a semiconductor chip on a package substrate.
