Every year, the United States spends more than $1 trillion in health care. While this is a step in the right direction, the United States still spends the most per capita for health care in the world. Part of the reason why the United States spends so much money on health care is because it has a lot of uninsured people. Of course, if everyone could afford health care, then this number would be a whole lot lower, and health care would be a whole lot cheaper. Since most people who get their health insurance through their employers usually get relatively cheap insurance, this makes it very easy to afford health care. But as a way to make health care more affordable for everyone, the majority of Americans instead rely on the individual insurance market. Some people like to think of the individual insurance market as a free market. They claim that if there is no government regulation, then everyone will voluntarily keep costs down in order to compete. But what many of those same people don't realize is that the private insurance market is a highly regulated market. Because of the regulations, insurance companies are not allowed to charge pre-existing conditions, cover children until they are 26 years old, provide pregnant women with prenatal care, and the like. This makes it very hard for an individual insurance provider to charge more for health care than any other company, unless there is actual legislation that requires them to do so. For example, if you had a life insurance policy with a $15,000 premium, but a company gave you free health care for the next decade, would you willingly increase your premium to $30,000? Probably not, right? So if the insurance companies are forced to compete fairly, then the prices of health insurance can go down. But if you give the insurance companies free money, then competition will not be much of an issue. Of course, there is a way to ensure that insurance companies don ASCB Update ( The American Society for Cell Biology. 21 October 1996 A nationwide survey of the communication needs of the biomedical community has found that access to professional information is a much greater problem for academic institutions than personal computers. The American Society for Cell Biology ( ASCB ) sent questionnaires last year to all 408 university-based members of the society's Board of Directors. The results found that only around half of the respondents could correctly name their institution's address on the White House Web site ( www.asscbsci.org ) -- the Web site of the ASCB. Dr. Mariam Novak, ASCB associate executive director, said " We found it astounding that so few of the schools could name their institutions on the ASCB Web site. Our mailing list includes some of the leading academic biomedical laboratories, and we'd expect more than half of those laboratories would be able to identify their institutions.

But we were surprised by the results. Clearly, there is a need for more communications resources at universities if they are going to engage in interdisciplinary research and promote collaborative scientific efforts between laboratories. That is one of the major goals of ASCB. The ASCB believes that one of its key objectives is to improve access to information among professionals through the broad distribution of high-quality information in audio and video formats. The ASCB also hopes to improve access for students through electronic communications. For these efforts, ASCB will continue to review the needs of the biomedical community and develop ways to meet those needs." The ASCB is the professional society of the American Society for Cell Biology -- the national association for scientists involved in the study of cells and their parts -- and encourages activities that encourage cooperation between institutions of higher learning and promote interdisciplinary research efforts. Its mission is to foster the study of cells and their parts at the molecular and genetic levels, which enable us to understand biology, medicine, and. In 1996, ASCB "altered the field of biomedical sciences by increasing the level of knowledge among scientists through such interdisciplinary programs as the G.C. and Germ Lines. The resources released by the ASCB in this fiscal year will be used to print special issues of FASEB Jour.... This past year the ASCB established the first Audio-Video Conference in Cell Science, to promote the use of audio and video technologies in cell biology, and it will be held in Gainesville, Florida, from October 7-8. The program will include five symposia featuring distinguished biologists from around the world, 6d1f23a050
