Current technologies for global computerized communications networks, such as the Internet, are generally based upon wired communication schemes, such as telephone lines and coaxial cable. Wireless technologies are playing an important role in enhancing these current systems. Wireless technologies rely on a physical means for passing information from one point to another. Wireless technologies include code division multiple access (CDMA), time division multiple access (TDMA) and frequency division multiple access (FDMA). Of the three wireless technologies, the FDMA technology, also known as frequency division multiple access (FDMA), typically covers the frequency bands from 900 megahertz (MHz) to 1.8 GHz, whereas the TDMA technology typically covers the frequency bands from 50 kHz to 1.8 GHz. Finally, the CDMA technology typically covers the frequency bands from 1.8 GHz to 2.4 GHz. For example, current CDMA wireless telephone systems utilize bandwidths of approximately 200 kilohertz (KHz) to 1.25 MHz, whereas current FDMA wireless telephone systems utilize bandwidths of approximately 200 KHz to 30 KHz. In TDMA, access to the frequency spectrum is controlled by the access time of the associated network elements. In FDMA, access to the frequency spectrum is controlled by the transmission bandwidth of the associated network elements. As the demand for wireless communication device services increases, current and future wireless systems will be required to accommodate the increased user density. Current wireless systems cannot handle the increased user density
